

"A Whim for Strawberries"

At the Literary Table in
Les quinze joies de mariage

NELLY LABÈRE

He seems a fine connoisseur, he who said that “a good marriage is that of a blind wife to a deaf husband.”¹

—Michel de Montaigne, Essays, Book III, Chapter V

This aphorism by Montaigne may inspire a smile: nothing like a blind wife and a deaf husband to ensure a successful marriage! And yet far from a simple quip, the saying finds its place in a well-known anti-matrimonial current that began in the Middle Ages (Jean de Meun's The Romance of the Rose, Eustache Deschamps' Miroir de mariage, Jean Le Fèvre's Lamentations de Matheolus) and includes Rabelais' Tiers Livre, in which Panurge never stops asking whether or not he should marry.² Among these works, The Fifteen Joys of Marriage, an anonymous text written around 1400, continually states that man is a fish that lets itself be hooked.³ While he believes himself to be living in joy(s) (fifteen of them precisely), he is plunged into a real matrimonial—and gastronomical—hell.⁴

The Fifteen Joys of Marriage tells the unhappy story of a husband who is forced to satisfy his wife with food. In order to seduce her, he had to invite her to a lavish dinner, but even after their marriage he continuously needs to refill the pantry in order to feed his wife's insatiable family and her numerous friends. Moreover, when she becomes